Unfamiliar Territory
A Phenomenological Study of International Students Enrolled in a Large Urban Community College

Laurie L. Malone
Advisor: Dr. Nasser Razek

Abstract
The international community college student population faces challenges that their domestic student counterparts do not confront. Adjusting to college can be difficult for many students without the added stress of exposure to a new country and culture. These students contribute to the financial bottom line and ethnic, racial, and religious diversity to the community colleges they attend. Considering this an understanding of their experience is needed.

Research Question
Exploratory in nature, examining the shared experience of international students and identifying themes. Specifically investigating:
• How does culture shock effect success?
• How do international community college students interpret their sense of connection and belonging to their college community?
• What obstacles are encountered, real or perceived, by this student population?
• What opportunities are available to better serve these students?

Study Significance
International student populations are growing at a faster rate than domestic students (Bohman, 2010). The trend of which community college leaders need to subscribe to is the globalization of education which “compels community colleges to internationalize their campus” (Ng, 2007, p. 83). International students enrolled with domestic students is positive for both groups in development as global citizens. Thereby a need to attract and retain international students exists.

Design
Qualitative: The study of things in their natural setting, a study of an array of information (Mertens, 2010).

Phenomenological research: “Seeks the individual’s perceptions and meaning of a phenomenon or experience” (Mertens, 2010, p. 235).

Methodology
Data Gathered:
Interviews
• 8 International Students
• 6 Faculty and Staff

Observations
• ESL Conversation Group

Analysis
The transcripts and observation notes were coded for themes and examined for similarities and/or disparities and compared/contrasted to relevant recent literature.
