Acknowledgements

Doing something like this is often more challenging than may be imagined. A few people at the University of Dayton were crucial in the development and completion of this project. My thanks go to Amy Anderson, executive director of the Center for International Programs for pointing me towards the <http://ecommons.udayton.edu> publication outlet at the University. Along with Sangita Gosalia, associate director of Campus Engagement at the Center, Anderson directed us to Frances Rice, director of Information Systems and Digital Access at the University of Dayton Roesch Library who took the idea to fruition. Rice explained the online publication process in a way that even a technological “challenged” individual such as I could understand. Thanks to Janis Krugh, professor at the department of global languages and cultures, for translating the essays from Spanish to English. My thanks go to the contributors of the articles who probably got tired of seeing my reminder e-mails. We agreed to do this product during one of our conversations in Buenos Aires, and we stayed the course. Finally, thanks to the university administration for supporting and paying for the trip. I hope these articles capture the essence of the outcome of the Global Education Seminar.
