  - Colleges and Universities are called to meet the changing needs of the modern college student and to reduce barriers preventing success. Utilizing advocacy and intervention techniques, the Dean of Students Office at the University of Dayton utilizes a case management model, rooted in student development theory, to support students in navigating a complex University environment.

The Dean of Students Office uses an individualized approach to assess needs and level of distress and offers resources and services to promote student retention and success. This presentation will provide an overview of case management services and share how it can be implemented at our peer institutions.

- Connection to conference theme: "Taking Flight: Developing Leaders for the Common Good" (up to 150 words)
  - In order for students to thrive, their basic needs must be met. By reducing systematic barriers and providing support, students are given an equitable opportunity to their education. When students are given the opportunity to success, they are able to develop into leaders for the common good.
