PUERTO RICO'S FUTURE: UD STUDENT COMMENTS ON POSSIBLE CHANGE

If she had to vote tomorrow on her three choices for her homeland's future, Wanda Pelegrina, of San Juan, Puerto Rico, said she's leaning toward a vote for independence.

Pelegrina, a graduate student in communication at the University of Dayton, said there needs to be a change in the commonwealth's current situation.

"The status now is the worst. It's a free-for-all," Pelegrina said. She said any change will be a tough transition, but she thinks something must be changed. "Our soldiers are always the first to be sent off, but we don't get to vote," she said.

"Some people say we would lose our culture or our language if we became a state, but if you look at states like Texas, Florida or New York with many Latina residents, they still preserve their heritage," she said.

Pelegrina said the possible vote in December is a common topic of conversation during her phone calls home and with other UD students from Puerto Rico. Approximately 70 students attend the University from Puerto Rico.
