Many people contributed to the planning of this symposium. First, my thanks go to the planning committee: namely, Patricia Alvarez, Denise James, Thomas Morgan, Joel Pruce, and Patricia Reid. The committee showed commitment and dedication. Even during moments when our work seemed to drift, someone always reminded us to return to the task at hand. During the final two months of planning, the group met weekly. It was a good committee and each individual made a difference. Second, I extend my sincere gratitude to our student workers and presenters. Their input was invaluable. From the beginning, the planning committee agreed the symposium would be student-focused. During the summer of 2015, Kwyn Townsend Riley and Tiara Jackson did archival work tracing the African American story on UD's campus from the 1920s to present. In the fall of 2015, the following student workers came onboard: Camila Robles, Joshua Steed, and Gianna Hartwig. All the students did a magnificent job as shown by their presentations. Third, my sincere thanks go to Veronica Morris, LaShea Smith, and JW Terry, all black alumni of UD. Their presentation was honest and helped to provide a broader perspective of race relations on campus. Fourth, I express a special gratitude to Kathleen Henderson, Andrew Ewwaraye, Kenya Crosson, and Versalle Washington for their insights on black staff-and-faculty presence on campus. Their remarks were thoughtful and shed light on issues of campus climate during the last fifty years. Una Cadegan, my colleague in the Department of History, added a thoughtful perspective on the Catholic Intellectual Tradition and race.

Provost Paul Benson promptly agreed to fund the students' research, planning, and the symposium itself. My thanks go to him for the support. In addition to funding the event, he delivered the symposium's keynote address. In an email to him, I noted that in my over twenty years as faculty at UD no senior administrator had taken on, in a very public forum, the topic of race and belonging on UD campus in the manner which he did in his address. I also extend my thanks to Jason Pierce, Anita Brothers, Richard Chenoweth, Juan Santamarina, and Larry Flockerzie, all of whom supported our efforts in one form or another. Sherry Williams and Yvette Moore-Homan were very helpful in logistics planning. Thanks to Nick Pici, who did the copy editing, and to Tricia Barger, who always accommodated and promptly corrected last-minute changes made on proofs. In sum, putting on this symposium was a team effort, and my thanks go to the entire team. Hopefully, they were not disappointed by the event. Finally, in compiling the booklet, except in a few cases I left articles the way they were submitted by the authors.
