DAYTON, Mar. --Lewis A. Jones, former procurement consultant at Wright-Patterson Air Force base, has been appointed director of student placement at the University of Dayton, the Very Rev. Andrew L. Seebold, S.M. U.D. president, announced Friday.

In this new position, Mr. Jones will direct the placement of the university's graduates in all divisions except education. This work formerly has been done by several different offices on the campus. The placement of education graduates will continue to be handled by the education division.

Mr. Jones, a native of Brandon, Vt., had served as a private procurement consultant for the Army in Okinawa and Japan following World War II. He had been with the War Production Board in Washington, D.C. during the war, serving as a liaison with small business. Earlier, he had spent some 30 years with public utilities in New York State.

In view of the ever-increasing demand by industry for college graduates throughout the country, a central office at the university for the handling of graduate placement was deemed necessary, according to Fr. Seebold. Mr. Jones's many years of association with business and industries provides the ideal background for this work, Fr. Seebold explained.

"We feel we not only should help the student find the position he desires after graduation, but we also owe industries all the assistance possible in helping them to find the personnel they seek from our campus," Fr. Seebold said.

Mr. Jones will assume his duties immediately.
