End of World War II

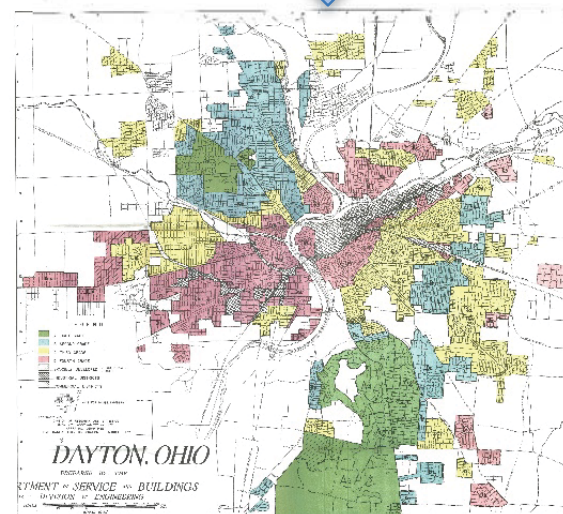

Soldiers came home to work and live in Modern America

Creation of Highways

Roads systems like I-75, 35, 675, and I-70 made travel easier and quicker

Creation of Suburbia

Population of cities just outside Dayton boomed due to new tenants and business brought with them.

Theoretical Perspective

After the war everyone was supposed to reap the benefits through economic assistance, yet this was not the case and often led to exclusions based on race. These led to the housing and economic stratification we see today.

Consequences

The struggle with these new suburban areas is the wealth, jobs, and services went with them. This led to the problems we see in the urban areas today due to lack of resources and opportunities. These problems include food deserts, lack of employment, high crime, and recycled poverty.

G.I. Bill

This was a law that passed in 1944 that provided educational assistance, housing assistance, and other benefits. This was to be provided fairly to all who served, but often times was not provided fairly to minorities.

Narratives

Mary Varnado talks about Dayton before I-75. It used to be an industries city with a lot of amenities. She attributes many of the inner-city problems to the highway.

Other stories that highlight these feelings are by Gwen Buchanan, Linda Wood, Dorothy Woods, and others.
