Advisor: Graham Hunter, Ph.D.

Research Questions
How do queer students of color develop, describe and make meaning through self-authorship of their racial and sexual orientations at a predominantly White institution?
Which element of their identity is the most salient?
How does their saliency influence their self-authorship?

Methodology
This study consisted of:
- six individual interviews grounded in the heuristic method
- students self-identifying
- interviews that were transcribed, coded and analyzed for emerging themes

Selected References

Research Themes

Compensation through Perfectionism
- Perceived Expectations set by others
- Expectations set by self

Compensation through Education
- Inquisitive Nature as knowledge is valued
- Knowledge is seen as an advancement and tied personally to self

Compensation through Socializing
- Value is placed highly on others opinions
- High emphasis on relationships

Implications
- A need for more literature and focus on self-authorship and the intersectionality of race and sexual orientation in queer students of color
- This is future ground work for further studies on queer students of color and the impact of these variables on this population
- To support queer students of color we must understand how they compensate, in an attempt to gain validation, so that we can better create an environment that is conducive for their development.

Acknowledgements
I would like to say thank you to all of my family, friends, mentors, Office of Multicultural Affairs, Housing and Residence Life, University Honors Program and LGBTQ+ Support Services for their ongoing support throughout my graduate school experience. Thank you to all of my professors for challenging me, encouraging me to reflect and grapple as I grew and continued to develop and to all of the participants for allowing me to share their stories.
