DAYTON, Ohio, November 20, 1968 -- Under the Eastman Kodak Company's 1968 educational aid program the University of Dayton has received a direct grant of $4,800. A total of 78 privately supported colleges and universities share in these direct grants valued at $364,200. The grants are based on the graduates from these institutions who joined Kodak within five years after graduation and are presently completing five years of company employment. Kodak contributes $600 each year of academic work completed by the employee at a privately supported, accredited school from which he received a bachelor's or graduate degree.

Since the start of the sixties, the value of Kodak's contributions to higher education has totaled about $23.5 million. Kodak's aid to education began early in this century when company founder George Eastman contributed generously from his own resources to a number of colleges and universities. Later company contributions were a continuation of Eastman's support of higher education. Through the years, more than 360 institutions of higher learning have benefited.
